By far the largest number of teeth presented for a dental operation are not only in a pathological condition, but in such a pathological condition as to demand a careful investigation of disease and to require a change of conditions by therapeutical treatment, as necessary means of saving them. Much more attention has been given by the profession to Therapeutics than to Pathology. But to study therapeutics independently of pathology is of no more use than to study the literature of a medical almanac. To treat disease by name and not by nature, is quackery. To use medicines by name and not according to their nature is also quackery. To treat disease, however simple its form, rationally and successfully, requires a knowledge of the working of disease underneath the surface and hidden from view. Disease must be treated according to its...
