Excerpt: . . . out this, which was a monument of national approbation of Irelands sons, whom he had so many years led in the paths of honour and danger; but, as frequently happens, the rewards were not enjoyed by those who deserved them, and it was no wonder that those to whom they fell could not very well account for the causes of their coming, and should thus abuse them. Seriously, it is imperative upon us to consider, and be just to others as to ourselves. If honest Englishmen would not allow us to be ill-used or insulted when we were in bondage, even by the duke himself, had he been inclined thatward, they will not allow us, now enlarged, to insult with impunity others, among them some of our best friends, or ascribe, even jeeringly, to a fellowprisoner, as a rescue, what was legally obtained from...
