Then, again, the organism can be separated from fluids containing it by passage through a porcelain filter. What is of great importance, as Pasteur has taught us, is that this organism does not originate de novo, but is propagated from animal to animal and from animal to man. The instance cited by Goldschmidt of the occurrence of hydrophobia in the island of Madeira is very instructive: with a population of 130,000 inhabitants, and about 11,000 dogs, there had never been a case of rabies on this island until...
